Greetings from the Dean

Training Students to Acquire Professional Skills in Advanced Fields through Integrated Research Projects

Our contemporary society faces global and intertwined problems which have multiple causes. In order to resolve these problems, our society needs not only individual studies in specialized areas, but also a new and interdisciplinary approach that addresses issues based on collaborative research in different research areas, such as policies and information systems, environment, media technologies, and education and system governance.

In 1994, Keio University established the Graduate School of Media and Governance. Since its inception, it has continued to provide an interdisciplinary methodology to resolve global issues.

The Graduate School of Media and Governance emphasizes three unique features; namely,

- i. Integrating technology with society,
- ii. Presenting problems to society at large and identifying the resolution of such problems, and
- iii. Conducting interdisciplinary and collaborative studies amongst researchers and students in different fields.

Its master's program imparts knowledge and problem finding and solving skills to students in advanced academic fields and sends them into society. Students are then able to use their knowledge and skills to identify and resolve social problems using a comprehensive perspective. The doctoral program established in 1996, focuses on training students to acquire professionalism, good judgment and ingenious originality. Students then enter society to become researchers, educators and specialists.

Currently, there are over three hundred research and development projects being carried out at the graduate school, which connect universities, business enterprises, central and local governments, NPOs and NGOs.

Students who study at SFC are provided with advanced information infrastructure, such as wireless LAN, ultra fast backbone network and distance learning facilities. The graduate school also offers financial support to students and provides scholarships and grants to students, such as the Young Leaders Scholarship, GAO Scholarship and Taikichiro Mori Memorial Research Grant. The Mori Grant itself supports more than one hundred research projects conducted by graduate students every year.

Not only has the graduate school provided opportunities to students, but also continuously reinvented it to be more open to society and promote better international cooperation. Since 2005, its master's program has been offering the double degree programs in collaboration with overseas affiliate universities to students. Again in 2005, a new admission category was made available to career professionals to study in the doctoral program. Since 2006, the graduate school has been offering a master's program in which students can acquire a degree by taking courses taught in English. At present, there are about one hundred international students studying at the graduate school.

The graduate school offers training courses in specialized areas called Professional Courses in the master's program to meet the requirements of a rapidly changing society. There are four courses; namely, Advanced IT Specialist Course, Environmental Innovator Course, Social Innovator Course and ICT Advanced Collaboration Course. The curriculum of each of these courses is designed to train students to become experts in respective fields. Students who successfully complete the courses through the curriculum can acquire a certificate in addition to a master's degree.

At present, there are eight research groups called Programs at the graduate school. There is a set of requirements for each Program and upon a successful completion of the requirements students will be awarded a certificate.

Project Courses are the core of the 'hands-on' research and learning for students at the graduate school. These courses are unique in the sense that they focus on active participation of students in practical and real-world social projects. They are basically taught by a team of faculty members. Students will get opportunities to participate in advanced research directed by faculty members. Students can also propose their own research projects, and upon consultation with faculty members they can conduct their own research projects as Project Courses. Students embarking on these research courses will be able to receive professional and practical training by making a research plan, conducting research and having their research work evaluated.

Over the years the Graduate School of Media and Governance has become a place where students can develop their skills, conduct high level research, understand the world they live in and realize their dreams and aspirations. As a dean of graduate school, I am always committed to ensuring academic excellence, integrated research and providing the best intellectual environment to our students.

TOKUDA, Hideyuki
Dean
Graduate School of Media and Governance

International Advanced Degrees Course (IADC)
